

OPPORTUNITY! COMMUNITY! HANDS ON! CLASS CREDIT!

Have you wanted an opportunity at Emory to put your ideas and training into action in an Internship class? Would you like to participate in a community of interns, reflecting together on the social, economic, and ethical dimensions of community-based work? Does an interdisciplinary approach sound appealing? How does it sound that you can pick your partnership from a list of well-respected placements with engaged supervisors? Read what students from last fall's Religion Internship class report:

"If I had only known about this course sooner, I could have understood the theories of my major so much better! Hands on Learning with a weekly community of reflection gave me the missing link at Emory."
[from a student working at a community change consulting group]

"The portfolio assignments taught me to write with focus and stronger analytical attention to the elements of my work. Taking my own voice seriously gave me a next step of maturity."
[from a student working in Emory's Sustainability Program]

"This was the most important experience I've had at Emory. I never imagined becoming so engaged and close to my peers and a teacher while learning how to make my studies matter for people in Atlanta."
[from a student working in an educational program for children]

"I think I've found my future career through this class."
[from a student working with the Dekalb Child Advocacy Unit]

"Listening to multiple views, since this class takes people from majors as diverse as Biology, Sociology, Music, and Philosophy - and students from the Business School, made all the difference in expanding my view of the world and how it works."
[from a student working in a medical setting for homeless people]

Check out the Religion Internship Class: REL 380. Fall 2007. It may offer you a whole new way of learning at Emory. All majors welcome. Variable Credit. Dr. Bobbi Patterson. Thurs 4-7 pm. For info: <http://religion.emory.edu/courses>
